| 400

While everybody has heard about the employee market, very few know how the employees have changed. Common benefits are no longer enough for new employees. The young do not have qualms about spending dozens of hours in the office every day. The key is what they are offered in exchange. Work has to give them satisfaction from the fact that they make a difference.

Under the new Happy Companies project Gazeta Wyborcza and partners launched a debate about a new organizational culture in business and the role of employer in building happy companies. Along debates and workshops, the project includes a series of articles published in printed and online media. Participants of the debates held in Gdańsk, Poznań, Wrocław and Cracow looked for a definition of 'happiness at work', explored the values and meaning of work, contemporary role of leader and operating in a market that changes with growing speed. Panellists talked about future challenges - automatization, AI and robotics, wondered how the sense of happiness at work is affected by the environment: the city, personal life, passions, health - and whether they could even be approached separately, as how should employer approach this ecosystem. Participants were also introduced to the best practices in the Polish market.

Four debates were held, with experts and employers, in Gdańsk, Poznań, Wrocław and Cracow, plus mindfulness workshops. Dedicated service Wyborcza.pl/szczęśliwe firmy was launched, with video materials and quality and expert editorial content.
